Intramural grant

Demographic Consequences of U.S. Racial Inter-marriage
Proposal Initiative Grant, College of Social and Behavioral Science, University of Utah, Summer 2006,
$4,000

This study investigates the consequences of racial and ethnic intermarriage through research projects examining three questions: (1) how does racial intermarriage affect fertility? (2) how does intermarriage affect marital stability? (3) what are the implications of racial intermarriage for the future racial composition of the United States? American social scientists have paid ample attention to the incidence of racial and ethnic intermarriage in recent decades. In particular, observed increases over time have been celebrated as evidence that racial and ethnic divisions are weakening. If more and more husbands and wives cross racial and ethnic lines in such an intimate and durable relationship as marriage, racial divisions must be dissolving. However, we know little about the consequences of intermarriage for demographic outcomes such as fertility and marital stability. The after-effects of intermarriage have consequences for the theoretical relevance of intermarriage. If intermarriage represents a weakening of group boundaries, as the conventional wisdom maintains, then the behavior of intermarried couples should match the behavior of same-race couples. If crossing a racial boundary in marriage signifies that the husband and wife accept each other fully, their behavior after the wedding ceremony should resemble the behavior of same-race couples.

Extramural grant

Immigration and Social Change in a "New Destination"
Agents of Change, Human and Social Dynamics Program, National Science Foundation, 2007-2010, $750,000 (not funded)

We will undertake a comprehensive study of immigrants as "agents of change" in Utah, covering six levels of analysis: a theoretical explanation for the emergence of new destinations, specifically Utah; empirical analysis of immigrant assimilation/ integration into labor and housing markets in Utah; the status and effect of these agents of change empirically analyzed through the prism of immigrant health; undocumented immigrants' effect as agents of change in this receiving area; and models of the future impact of these immigrants. Finally, the results of these analyses will be entered into the public policy arena of the state through a variety of outreach activities.

Role: Co-investigator (PI: Ken Jameson, Department of Economics)

Doctoral dissertation

Regional, Temporal, and Group Variation in U.S. Racial and Ethnic Intermarriage

Regional variation in a wide variety of social and demographic characteristics of the U.S. population is readily acknowledged. However, little is known about regional variation in racial and ethnic intermarriage. This dissertation describes broad regional variation in racial and ethnic intermarriage and explores sources of this variation. After controlling for the effects of group size, the tendency to intermarry is stronger in the West and weaker in the Northeast and South. The tendency to intermarry is weaker when minority groups are larger in size. There is also evidence that intermarriage is more common when economic conditions are more favorable. The dissertation also describes variation among groups in intermarriage. The different Asian groups and different Latino groups have greatly varying intermarriage patterns, suggesting that the composite categories Asian and Latino obscure a great deal of variability. However, there is an affinity that promotes intermarriage between members of different Asian groups, but no such pattern was found for members of different Latino groups. The dissertation also finds that the most important distinction affecting marriage outcomes is the divide between Blacks and non-Blacks.
